Summary and Conclusion:

Meghalaya, being one of the 6th Scheduled Areas where the provisions of 73rd and 74th Amendment of the Constitution do not apply, follows a different development and planning approach in formulation of Annual and Five Year Plans. The present development planning structure consists of mainly the Planning Board at the State level and the District Planning and Development Council (DPDC) at the district level. In 2004, another level of planning organization was added namely the two Regional Planning and Development Councils (RPDCs) which are largely non functional. Presently the State Planning Board and the DPDC are getting more broad based and meaningful.

In the Panchayati Raj States (73rd and 74th amendment of the constitution States), besides, the organized structure, the provisions clearly spells out a direct role for the people through the Panchayats in planning, formulation and implementation of development projects and programmes. This is backed up by delegation of powers to the Panchayats in monitoring of development schemes and in relation to 29 subjects contained in the Eleventh Schedule.

The formulation of district plan by the DPDCs in Meghalaya is largely based on departmental proposal submitted by the district offices with inputs from MLAS and MDCs etc. The district plans prepared by the DPDCs are essentially edited compilation of departmental proposals to fit in the cast of budget or notional financial outlays. In the formulation of the state plan, while theoretically the document should incorporate district plans forwarded by the DPDCs, often the plans are formulated and compiled by the various sectoral heads, deliberated with the Planning Board and fine tuned by the Planning Department from the sectoral proposals of various Government Departments in line with guidelines set out by the State Government and the Planning Commission. In doing so the essential advisory and feedbacks of State Planning Board, and other state level entities are taken on board to the extent desirable and considered necessary.
